WEATHER KEY POINTS

02/13/22 - 02/19/22

Sunday

- Unseasonably warm temperatures will continue for the Central Valley and southern California Sunday, with near-record setting high temperatures possible with daytime highs in the upper 70s up to 90 degrees.
  - Winter heat waves have historically been documented as dangerous due to a lack of human acclimatization, especially for those who may be visiting from much colder areas, despite overnight low temperatures of 45 to 65 degrees
- The warm weather will start to gradually cool today across northern California afternoon with high clouds moving in.

Monday - Early Tuesday

- A return to gradually cooler temperatures is expected through the work week, with light precipitation expected across northern California Monday and Tuesday, and also into portions of southern California for Tuesday. Light accumulating snowfall is possible in the mountains.
- Gusty southwest winds of 25-40 mph are likely in the Sierras on Monday and Tuesday
- Gusty onshore winds are also possible across the Southern Region deserts/mountains starting Monday and Tuesday, potentially lingering through mid-to-late week

Late Tuesday-Saturday

- High pressure will rebuild across the northern part of the state starting Tuesday, then southern California on Wednesday, bringing continued dry conditions and offshore winds
- Winds quickly turn to the north and east on Tuesday across the Central Valley and Sierras, and persist into Thursday. This is forecast to be a moderate offshore event similar to last week's with gusts of 25-35 mph in the valley, and gusts of 35-45 mph (locally higher) across the wind-prone areas of the foothills and mountains.
- Periods of gusty northeast winds will be possible mid to late week across Southern California, but no notable Santa Ana events are expected at this time.
